SUPPORT AND SERVICE

On the surface of things, it certainly does look as though a war is won or lost on the various battlefronts. Yet, it is quite evident that a fighting force must have supplies and organization so that everything goes smoothly. Long ago it was said that an army fights on its stomach. To which was added the additional fact that guns without bullets are useless.

We are going to take a look behind the scenes in our recent war. For the prosecution of the war in Korea called for a tremendous administration and logistical effort on the part of the Eighth Army. Decisions in Washington and Tokyo required that the army not only carry on its tactical mission but operate the supply lines within the peninsula, administer the rear areas, give relief to the disrupted civilian populations, and run the prisoner of war camps until August 1952 — tasks normally carried out by the theater headquarters. In addition, the Eighth Army had to integrate the multinational forces fighting in Korea within its command structure.

To integrate the ground contingents offered by member countries of the United Nations most efficiently, the U. N. commander's plan was to assign them, according to their size, to American units within the Eighth Army. Thus the Turkish Brigade came under the control of and American division. The United Kingdom's two brigades and the one from Canada were placed under army control until July 1951. Then the 1st British Commonwealth Division was formed and assumed control of all Commonwealth forces in Korea.

This division, in turn, came under operational control of an American corps. Since all other ground combat units were of battalion size, they were attached to the U. S. infantry regiments. A number of problems required immediate solution. Language barriers, different standards of training, divergent tactical concepts, variation in dietary habits, dissimilar religious and national customs and other discrepancies had to be reconciled. Some were resolved with little or no difficulty while other required extensive planning for solution.

The difficulties experienced when the first U. N. contingents came to Korea led the Eighth Army to organize the United Nations Reception Center. The center became responsible for clothing and equipping U. N. forces upon their arrival in Korea. And for providing them with familiarization in American arms and equipment. As the newcomers went through the reception center, American officers could evaluate their proficiency. These officers soon learned that some of the units were not so well trained as advance reports had indicated. Some lacked aggressiveness and as a result, the familiarization programs were expanded.

Training and other factors influenced the assignment and subsequent role of the U. N. contingents, although the most desirable course of action was to employ all U. N. units exactly as similar U. S. units were employed. The units whose training did not approximate U. S. standards and who did not develop satisfactorily received additional training while on line of communications guard duty before being committed.

Troops not naturally aggressive and under poor leadership were not given as assault role in the attacks. Those lacking in soldierly steadfastness did not receive key defense missions. But most U. N. units were considered capable of executing any tactical mission appropriate for a similar U. S. unit.

In assigning the U. N. units and in giving them missions, U. S. commanders had to reckon with divergent staff and tactical concepts and techniques. One unit preferred organizing the high ground when on the defense. Whereas American doctrine favored organizing the forward slopes to obtain maximum effect with grazing and interlocking fire from automatic weapons. Another unit considered reconnaissance in force and combat patrols wasteful, in that casualties were suffered without the compensatory gain of a physical objective.

Some units did not think in terms of massed fire power to the degree U. S. forces did. There were other minor variations. But generally the non-U. S. units endeavored to pattern their actions after those of their American counterparts. Most of the U. N. officers from other countries, particularly staff officers, had attended various U. S. service schools. They were thus familiar with American tactical doctrine. And their military concepts and practices were generally in accord with it.

With so many nationalities operating under a unified command in Korea it was only natural that language difficulties should develop. Although the language problem was never completely solved, it did not interfere with the army's tactical operations. English was the official language. And all orders, directives and instructions were issued in that tongue. The task of translation fell on the non-U. S. contingents for they had enough men who knew English well. Whereas the American commands to which the contingents were attached had too few soldiers that were competent in a language other than their own. The integrated U. N. units also furnished liaison officers to these same American commands.

National differences in customs and tastes led to many complications in supplying U. N. forces with rations. Because of Moslem religious restrictions, the Turks could not eat pork or products made from pork. The Hindus of the Indian contingent could not eat beef because of similar restrictions. The Turks wanted strong coffee, spices and butter instead of margarine. The Hindus had to have rice, curry powder and strong spices. Thailanders and Filipinos required rice, strong spices and strong tea and coffee. The Dutch missed their milk and cheese and the French their bottle of wine. Nearly all of the Europeans wanted a great deal more bread than the American ration provided. The Japan Logistical Command Quartermaster modified the ration to meet these various requirements.

Items of American clothing generally won the favor of the U. S. troops from other countries, even though many of them were not convinced that two layers of light clothing were better for winter than a single layer of heavy clothing.

The major problem was in measurements. Western Europeans are of about the same size as Americans. So are the Greeks and the Turks, though their wider feet made fitting of shoes difficult. Oriental troops such as the Thailanders and Filipinos, on the other hand, are considerably smaller and their clothing had to be cut down. For them too, fitting of shoes was a problem, especially for the Thailanders.

Logistical support of an army in the field is a tough task even under ideal conditions. In South Korea, conditions were far from ideal. The country has only one port — Pusan — considered adequate to handle incoming military supplies. The mountainous East Coast and the extreme tidal range of the West Coast prohibit construction of adequate ports. Inchon, the port for Seoul and several smaller ports on the West and South Coasts were available. But deep-draft vessels had to remain off-shore and have their cargos lightered in. Hence Pusan became the major port for the Eighth Army and received nearly all supplies.

There were disadvantages in using Pusan as the chief port. It is located at the extreme southeast tip of the peninsula. As the Eighth Army moved northward its supply line was correspondingly extended. The lack of adequate railroads and highways from Pusan to the battle front added to the burden of maintaining the supply line. Moreover, concentrating the bulk of supplies at one port provided an excellent target for enemy air attacks.

To move supplies and equipment forward from Pusan to the front, the 2nd Logistical Command utilized the Korean railroad as the chief means of transportation. But the Korean rail system left much to be desired. Its 3,500 miles of track are concentrated mostly in the western half of the peninsula because the mountains prevent construction of lines in eastern Korea. Another complication is that the system's main truck lines, one double track from Pusan to Seoul and a single track from Pusan to Ch'unch'on, have very few feeder lines. The forces in eastern Korea therefore had to truck supplies from the main lines over great distances.

The problems of rail support increased as the Eighth Army advanced northward and track mileage under its control lengthened. The rail system had suffered a good deal of damage in fighting. And a shortage of rolling stock developed. Air and military bombardments had destroyed tracks and rolling stock, yards and repair shops, railroad bridges and tunnels. A lack of enough skilled workers hindered the restoration of the damaged lines, although the Eighth Army's engineers worked constantly at the job.

The highway system of Korea was not built to support modern military operations. The roads are narrow, badly-drained and poorly surfaced. Snow and ice cover them in the Winter. And Spring thaws and summer rains make them impassable. So the roads had to be improved — and new ones constructed and maintained.

And yet, under such conditions, a war has to be fought and won. The soldier on the front can't bother to figure out why food or munitions are late. From his point of view, they must be there when needed. So what we called Support and Service becomes the vital link in keeping the fighting forces supplied and in an efficient condition.

— THE END —

YOU DON'T KNOW I'M COMING,
MAMA MIA... BUT I WILL
SEE YOU IN A FEW HOURS!

THE PLATOON SETTLED DOWN TO WORK, FIGHTING THE TANK CREWS AND THE SURVIVORS OF THE TRUCK CONVOY! LT. MORENO KNEW HIS UNEXPECTED HELPERS WOULD COME TO HIM SOONER OR LATER...

ATTACK

THE DIVISION COMMANDER KNEW LT. MORENO'S HISTORY-- HE WAS RELYING ON THE LIEUTENANT'S KNOWLEDGE OF THE ISLAND! AND HE'D GIVEN THE VILLAGE TO HIS PLATOON AS THEIR SECONDARY OBJECTIVE...

THERE, LIEUTENANT-- THERE IS THE VILLAGE WHERE YOUR FATHER LIVES!

GET BACK, BOY! SHOW ME WHERE THE GERMAN COMMANDANT LIVES!

THERE--THE PLATZGAULETIER IS THERE--AND YOUR BROTHER IS A PRISONER INSIDE THAT BUILDING!

TAKE YOUR MEN AROUND THE SLOPE, SERGEANT! IN TEN MINUTES, COMMENCE FIRING! I'LL TAKE THEIR HEADQUARTERS FROM THIS SIDE THEN!

MEANWHILE, OFF-SHORE, 3200 SHIPS WERE PUTTING TROOPS ASHORE IN THE SICILY INVASION! EVERY GERMAN SOLDIER THAT COULD BE SPARED HAD BEEN TAKEN FROM THE VILLAGE! THE SICILIANS HAD WAITED FOR THAT CHANCE-- AND THEY ACTED...

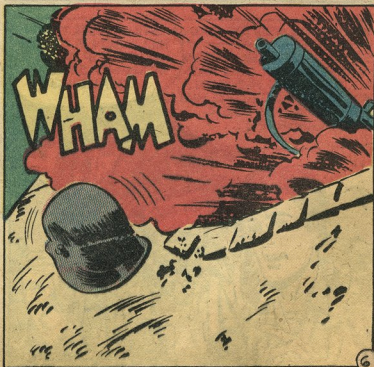

LOOK, THE CIVILIANS ARE ATTACKING THE NAZIS TOO!

THE FIRST THING I'D BETTER DO IS TAKE CARE OF THIS MACHINE GUN POSITION!

PLING!

ATTACK

LT. MORENO SMASHED INTO THE NAZI HEADQUARTERS! THE GERMANS WERE TOO SURPRISED TO ACT--ALL BUT ONE...

THE REST OF YOU PUT UP YOUR HANDS AND DON'T MOVE!

ALL RIGHT, COMMANDANT-- LEAD ME TO YOUR PRISONERS! NOW!

THEY ARE DOWNSTAIRS! FOLLOW ME!

AFTER THE PRISONERS WERE RELEASED AND THE NAZIS TAKEN AWAY...

YOU ARE GUISEPPE MORENO? I AM PAUL, YOUR BROTHER!

I TOLD THEM YOU WOULD COME! I KNEW YOU WOULD, FRATELLO MIO!

NO GERMANS LEFT TO FIGHT, SIR! THE VILLAGERS TOOK CARE OF THEM BEFORE WE GOT A CHANCE

THAT'S WONDERFUL, SERGEANT! PUT OUT SENTRIES--I'VE GOT TO SEE SOMEONE!

MAMA MIA!

PAOLO, FIGLIO MIO! FIGLIO MIO!

THAT WAS LIEUTENANT PAUL MORENO'S HOMECOMING TO SICILY-- HISTORY WILL RECORD IT AS A DEFEAT FOR ITALY AND GERMANY-- BUT THE SICILIANS, WHO HATED THE GERMANS, WELCOMED THE AMERICAN TROOPS!
